COMBINED OPERATIONS ON
PHU QUOC ISLAND

By Lt. F. B. Green, USN

AN THOI, VIETNAM --- The war on Phu Quoc Island, located 50 miles west of the Vietnamese mainland in the Gulf of Thailand, has often been described as a vest pocket miniature of the war on the mainland - nevertheless, the Viet Cong are as real and as much an enemy as the VC elsewhere in Vietnam; they are a constant threat to the vast prisoner of war complex located on the island.

To meet this threat, the Vietnamese Regional Forces, charged with the security of local population centers and military installations, recently initiated a series of unique operations which included an amphibious landing. Every available military resource in the area was used. The Vietnamese Navy, U. S. Navy and U. S. Coast Guard provided surface units; everything from the troop carrying landing craft to a rocket fire support ship, the St. Francis River. They bombarded the shores and provided gunfire support during the entire operation. The U. S. Army provided a small spotter plane; and the Vietnamese Regional which took part in the amphibious landing.

The amphibious assault took place in the early hours of the second day of the operation three miles south of Ham Ninh on the eastern side of the island. The VC had been forced into the area by troops moving in from the northwest. An amphibious landing was something they did not expect. Seeing the multitude of troops coming ashore was too much for Charlie, and he fled leaving much of military value behind. As one observer described the scene when SWIFT boats and Coast Guard Cutters opened up on the beach with mortar and 50 caliber machine gun fire in preparation for the landing, "this is getting to be a hot little island".

And so it will continue to be as Vietnamese and U. S. Armed Forces combine in their relentless pursuit of the enemy -- both on and off the mainland -- in the country of South Vietnam.

Commander Adrian L. Lonsdale of Mattapoisett, serving with the U. S. Coast Guard in Vietnam, took part in the operations described in the above article.

by Donald R. Bernard
Part VIII

Once again to remind our readers, the attack on Bedford Harbor by the British troops was to destroy privateers, prizes and prize goods. Comparatively few dwellings were destroyed by burning. Some were unavoidably involved in the destruction of adjacent warehouses. A few residences of prominent patriots were burned, and some may have been set on fire by soldiers in drunken insubordination.

As the advancing British troops were forc-

It was decided at that time by those in charge that a stand would be at the bridge (river's end) and an attempt made to stop the surging invaders from crossing the river.

Hastily arriving at that time after receiving word at Howland's Ferry was the company's commander, Captain Cushing, who quickly ordered the bridge torn up in hopes of thwarting the British attempt to cross the river. This demonstration of patriotism and Metcalf. As the ever advancing column of "Red Coats" veered a right column at Lund's Corner, all was in defensible readiness for inevitable battle that was to follow. As well as can be determined, this clash took place at about midnight on the fifth of September, 1778. A battle of fierce determination erupted as volley after volley thundered from the muzzle of this lone artillery piece, and the battle arrayed riflemen scattered on the flanks of this hillsided highway.

During the exchange of musket fire, Lieutenant Metcalf of the State Artillery Company was felled by a British musketball and later died. The casualty list of this determined, courageous group listed four men wounded and sixteen missing and still another sixteen having been captured and taken prisoners. Although our bold and heroic troops were hopelessly outnumbered and a victory being realistically impossible, the plan of withdrawal was considered. However, escape across the river at this point seemed unlikely, because of the previous order by Captain Cushing to destroy the bridge. But, under the cover of darkness, the patriots withdrew northward on Mill Road as the trespassers finally crossed over the Acushnet River in their continual drive on sacking the village of Fairhaven. Lieutenant Metcalf, was concealed by members of his company until the British had passed. Later, he was carried by his men to company headquarters on Union Street in the village of Bedford, and in just three short days Lieutenant Metcalf succumbed to the wound that was inflicted by a British musketball. His lifeless body, again supported by his subordinates, was driven along County Road, the same route his assassins pursued a few days before. The cortege crossed the river after passing the spot where Metcalf received the fatal blow. The contingent continued up the hill to the village green at the meeting house. Here in the Precinct Cemetery, among strangers and in a village foreign to him, he was layed to rest with full military honors as attested to by a Mr. John Gilbert, an inhabitant of that town.

Lieutenant Metcalf, who came from Boston as a soldier of the Continental Army, lies unsung with not even a tombstone to
